In the past, we've told you about printers' errors delaying a book's release... and the tale this time is similar. But in this case the error was the color separator's, and it delayed not one but two books. The cover art and mechanicals for Tales of the Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles #1 and the reprint of Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles #4 all went to the separator simultaneously... and somewhere in the handling of the elements of these two covers, the artwork was switched. The error was not caught until all those covers had been printed, and the reprint of TMNT #4 had actually been printed and bound and shipped (with the wrong art on the cover). Obviously, all of these covers and books were useless, and had to be recalled and destroyed, and the whole process begun anew. Suffice it to say that a lot of hair was pulled over this fiasco, and we have instituted policies to keep this from happening again... we hope.

We're really happy with the response so far to Tales of the TMNT. Jim and Ryan are really getting up to speed, and have done some very nice work for this second issue — the first TMNT story, I might add, which features an actual caped and costumed adventurer! (Plus a lot of other neat stuff, of course.)

Hopefully, this book will be out by August 6, at which time the whole Mirage Studios gang will be attending the San Diego comic show for four days of fun and frolic and signing books and doing sketches... in other words, a working vacation. Maybe we'll see you there!
